Interview

What explains Marico's new found aggression?

From launching products in segments with established players to buying out brands in the adjacency to get to heavy hitters 2.0 in the Parachute Coconut Oil space, Marico's latest play is different

Shreya M Thombre · Mumbai

Get the Deep Dive

A Marico, the veteran seems to be about pushing the envelope a bit further lately. In the 1990s, Marico took on the multinationals in the hair oil segment with Parachute and Nihar, and then launched packaged consumer goods (PCG) segments like Saffola, Hair & Care and Fiancé. In 2012, it bought Paras Pharma, Marico's first foray into the personal care (PC) segment. Then, it launched Saffola Oats in 2015, then Kaleshwari Linen (Kaleshwari Kalakaar) in 2016, Saffola Honey in 2017, Saffola Active Edible Oil in 2018, and Set Wet and Ads Oats Sugarfree Almonds in 2019. Each of these launches was in a segment where it already had a strong presence or was the industry giants. Each has played out differently, but the common thread is that Marico has been willing to take risks and reinvent. At Marico, 'to feel safe in the adjacency' is not the way to play, it is to be in the adjacency and then to be safe.

Now, in 2020, Marico has launched Saffola Fittify, a diet food range, and has bought out a profitable soap co to fill the brand's portfolio. Is it time to be aggressive? Is it the right time? Is it the right move?

It sure is. It is a commendable growth and profitability ramp up for the brand business. It is also a good time to be in the soaps and edible oils segments.